Gizlilik İlkesi Ubisoft has announced Riders Republic, an open, massively multiplayer extreme sports game by Ubisoft Anney, the same studio that gave us Steep. The idea of Riders Republic is almost identical to its snowy predecessor: it's a big open world, you have a lot of extreme sports to do in it, and a lot of people to do it with. The main difference is that, where steep was purely a winter sports-themed experience, Riders Republic has dirt, snow, mountains and more to race around in. Think of it as Steep: Bikes Edition. I'm a little confused that this isn't just Steep 2, and the developer's comment trailer doesn't mention it at all. It wasn't the rip-roaring success Ubisoft might have hoped, but it was still a solid title in a heavily underutilized genre. Still, Riders Republic seems to be a bit sillier and a little more free form than Steep was, so I'm well ready for it. Riders Republic launches on 25 May 2018. Relief Center Ubisoft has unveiled Riders Republic, a mass of multiplayer outdoor extreme sports games and something of a spiritual successor to its underrated winter sports affair Steep.As in that game, Riders Republic is focused on extreme sporting action across a vast open world, but while Steep limited itself to snow-capped mountains and other frosty places, Ubisoft's latest efforts have a wide range of terrain. Riders Republic world draws from seven different U.S. national parks - Bryce Canyon, Yosemite Valley, Sequoia Park, Zion, Canyonlands, Mammoth Mountain, and Grand Teton - taking actual GPS data and stitching each iconic area together in a way that supposedly feels natural. the resulting map has a varied mix of terrain, spanning green forest tracks, cliffs, dry desert spander, and yes, many snow-capped mountains. all combined in, going by the announcement footage at least, a lovely rendered whole. Here, players can enjoy the likes of snowboarding, cycling, skiing and wingsuit action (of both vanilla and jet-powered varieties), and while solo and co-op games are both supported, Ubisoft is pushing large-scale multiplayer competition - including races with up to 50 players and 6x6 PvP venues - as a major focus. Events, meanwhile, range from traditional challenges to more zany offerings, with the preview trailer unfortunately choosing a tone that feels more than a little forced.
